

It has been a contradictory question lately: to have or not to have a personal site. Some people, especially the young ones, are strongly for it, they can't even imagine themselves without computer chats, blogs, sites and other electronic means of communication. While others are against, they think that technology penetrates too deep in the sphere of personal life. On the one hand, personal sites give great opportunities for getting and sharing information. You can easily connect anyone everywhere in the world. Sites are necessary for some people as a part of their professional activity, for instance, for businessmen and even for us, teachers. A personal site is a place where we can store the most useful and interesting material needed in language teaching and studying, moreover, we can invite others to see and use it too. "Two heads are better than one!", and what to say if there are much more heads than two? But on the other hand, personal information needs to be protected, as too many different people have access to it when it is published. Besides, it can't be argued, sometimes it is difficult to understand the other person's words if you don't see his eyes and don't hear the intonation of his voice. So, it is very important to use only correct words and phrases. As for me, I do want to have my personal site, firstly, it is the demand of time and secondly, it is so exciting to learn new things!
